When the revolution swept over Russia the Princess was lady in waiting to the Grand Duchess Vladimir of Russia, an aunt of the Czar. With a small party of retainers the Grand Duchess and Princess were driven from their home in the Crimea and were followed by vengeful revolutionists. Fleeing from one part of Russia to another, they had narrow essayes from capture. Which one part of Russia to another, they had narrow escapes from capture, which would have meant death. Arriving after many hardships at a Black Sea port they were taken on board a British warship. They went to the South of France, where three years ago the Princess met Capt. Campbell, who had served with the Scottish Horse and was in the landing at Suvia Bay.

The Philharmonic Society began its eighty-first season last evening in Carnegie Hall. The concert was the 1,676th of the famous old organization, the collect orchestral body in this country Fiftleth street, by the Rev. Leighton and one of the oldest in the world. Its Parks, rector. history is not only long but honorable. Large delegations from League Club, the American Defense So. musical activities of this city is prond.

The audience was representative in many respects. It contained those of eminence in music, letters and the arts and persons of the most distinguished social position.

harmonic patrons. In accordance with the custom of the organization's later years the program was both conservative and progressive. The first number was Beethoven's seventh symphony, one of the most spirited and joyous of the master's creations, a fitting prelude to a season rich in promise.

The other numbers were the symphonic overture entitled "Sursum Corda," composed by young Erich Korngold (who is best known to New York music lovers as the writer of "Die Tote Stadt," the opera associated with the local debut of Mime, Jeritza), Debussy's two nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and the dance from Richard Stratus's opera "Salome."

Mr. Korngold's overture was composed in 1919 when the musician was 23 years old and was first played under his direction in Vienna in January, 1921. The title is from the communion service and in English is "Lift up Your Hearts." The composer has furnished in detail the plan of his work, which is fashioned after all according to venerable formulae and is architecturally constructed so as to command the approval of musical patriarchs and even more youthful conservators of traditions.

Perhaps only in the elaborate treatment of the orchestration can it be dubbed quite "modern." There are measures upon measures which sound like quotations from "Die Tote Stadt," the also was governor of the Society of Mayflower Descendants. It is a thing of thematic shreds and patches, marshalled with instrumental pomp and circumstance.

But it is hardly worth while to prolong consideration of this decrepit young man's baffled efforts. When Verdi gave us "Falstaff" we were all lost in wonder that an aged man could write music so full of the fire and enthusiasm and freehness of youth. Korngold's music sounds like that of a tired man of many years, distillusioned, weary of the futile clanging of tints.

It took more musicians to play the overture than it did to play the Beethoven symphony, but it was the first work on the list that lifted up the hearts of its hearers, not the second. Mr. Stransky led his men turough an eager, nearching, sometimes impetuous performance of Beethoven's composition. There was no dilatoriness in the delivery.

The conductor wasted no time in trying to gild refined gold, nor did he endeavor to paint any liftes. He sped onward, driving the someous tones before him like flying clouds before a
